Chapter 8

DANIEL TOBER – Fordham University, New York City, New York
dtober@fordham.edu

Megarians’ Tears: Localism and Dislocation in the Megarika

Those who weep through compulsion or without genuine emotion, explains the paremiographer Zenobios, shed ‘Megarians’ Tears’. He offers two etiologies, the first historical, the second horticultural (5.8):

They say that Bakchios, a Corinthian, married the daughter of Klytios, king of the Megarians, and that when she died the Megarians were forced by Klytios to send young women and men to Corinth to mourn for his daughter. Others say, however, that a great deal of garlic is reputed to grow in the land of the Megarians, for which reason the proverb is applied to those who weep disingenuously, since those who have eaten a lot of garlic shed tears continuously from its pungency. So tears that come not from feelings nor from depth but from the surface they call ‘Megarians’ Tears’.

1 Μεγαρέων δάκρυα: αὐτή τέτακται ἐπὶ τῶν πρόσ βιαν δακρύοντων, καὶ μὴ ἐπὶ σοίκείῳ πάθει. Λέγουσι γάρ Βάκχιόν τινα Κορίνθιον γῇμαι τὴς Κλυτίου τοῦ Μεγαρέων βασιλέως θυγατέρα ἣς ἀποθανοῦσης, ἀναγκασθήσει τοὺς Μεγαρέας ὑπὸ τοῦ Κλυτίου πέμπειν παρθένους καὶ ἡμέες εἰς Κόρινθον τοὺς μέλλοντας αὐτοῦ τὴν θυγατέρα καταθρηνήσειν. Οἱ δὲ φασιν, ὅτι πλέοντα δοκεῖ φύεσθαι ἐν τῇ Μεγαρέων σκόρδα ἐνθεν τὴν παροιμίαν εὑρήθαι ἐπὶ τῶν προσποιητῶν δακρύοντων, παρόσον οἱ ἐμπιπλάμενοι τῶν σκορδῶν ἀποδακρύουσι συνεχῶς ὑπὸ τῆς δριμύτητος. Ὡθεν τὰ μὴ ἐκ παθῶν μηδὲ ἐκ βάθους δάκρυα, ἀλλ’ ἐξ ἐπιπολῆς, Μεγαρέων δάκρυα ἔλεγον.

Hans Beck and Philip J. Smith (editors). Megarian Moments. The Local World of an Ancient Greek City-State. Teiresias Supplements Online, Volume 1. 2018: 183-207. © Daniel Tober 2018. License Agreement: CC-BY-NC (permission to use, distribute, and reproduce in any medium, provided the original work is properly attributed and not used for commercial purposes).
The expression serves as a good starting point for a study of Megarian local historiography not because it suggests the frustration that attends any scrutiny of the Megarika – the tears one sheds in trying to marshal these meager fragments are quite sincere – but rather because, together with Zenobios’s commentary, it helps to foreground two themes that recur with some frequency in Megarian cultural memory. On the one hand, tears: the Megarians’ constitutive narrative is punctuated by scenes of death, burial, and lamentation, forced or otherwise. On the other hand, tensions with nearby poleis: Megara framed its past to a large extent by its interactions with its neighbours, Corinth, along with Argos and Sikyon, on one side and Athens and Boiotia on the other.

Zenobios, who compiled his three books of proverbs at Rome under the emperor Hadrian, offers one of the fullest but by no means the only explanation of ‘Megarians’ Tears’. Our earliest discussion comes, in fact, from the Atthidographer Demon, who wrote a compendium of proverbs around the end of the fourth century BCE and who interpreted another phrase, ‘Korinthos son of Zeus’, by drawing on a similar nexus of traditions as would Zenobios for ‘Megarians’ Tears’ (FGrH 327 F19). Megara was originally a colony of Corinth, Demon explained, and once so much under Corinthian sway that every time one of the Bacchiadi died, Megarians were compelled to travel to Corinth and publicly grieve over the corpse. Gradually, however, the Megarians began to gain in strength and

---

2 For Zenobios, whose collection of proverbs drew primarily on the earlier work of Loukillos of Tarrha and Didymos (Suda Z73), see Bühler 1987: 33–38.

3 Indeed, the expression was itself probably Athenian in origin: a fragment, perhaps, of Attic comedy (Kock 1880: F872) related to what was perceived as manipulative yet ultimately bootless whining following Athenian legislation against Megara in the 430s BCE.

4 = Schol. Pind., Nem. 7.158b: παροιμία ἐστίν ἐπί τῶν τὰ αὐτὰ λεγόμενα ὁ Δίὸς Κόρινθος …. δοκεῖ οὖν ἀπὸ τοιούτου τινὸς εἰρήσθαι ἡ παροιμία: Μεγαρέας φασὶ Κορινθίων ἀπόκουσι, καὶ πολλὰ τοῖς Κορινθίοις κατ᾽ ισχὺν τῆς πόλεως ὑπείκειν, ἀλλὰ τις γὰρ πλείον τοὺς Κορινθίους προστάσαι, καὶ τῶν Βακχιαδῶν ἢ τίς τελευτήσαι (διόικου δὲ οὕτω τίν πόλιν), ἐδίκη Μεγαρέων ἄνδρας καὶ γυναῖκας ἐλθόντας εἰς Κόρινθον συγκηθεῖσιν τῶν νεκρῶν τῶν Βακχιαδῶν, ὡς δὲ ἢβρεώς οὖν ἀπελεύσον οἱ Κορίνθιοι, τὰ τῶν Μεγαρέων ἔρρωσο, τικά πρὸς ἑλπίς τοῦ μὴ δὲν παθεῖν ἀποστάντας αὐτῶς, ἀλλ’ ἀφεῖναι, πέμπουσι δὴ ταῦτα πρέβει οἱ Κορινθίοι κατηγοροῦσαν τῶν Μεγαρέων, ὃι προσελάτοντες εἰς τὴν ἐκκλησίαν ἀλλὰ τις λεῖν διεξήλθον καὶ τέλος ὧν δικαίως <ἀν> στεναζεῖ. οὐκ ἐπὶ τοῖς γενομένους ὁ Δίὸς Κόρινθος, δὲν λήψαι δίκην παρ’ αὐτῶν. ἐπὶ τοῖς δὲ παραζωνύμοις οἱ Μεγαρεῖς τούς <τε> πρέβει <παραχρήμα> λίθοις ἐβαλον: καὶ μετὰ μικρὸν ἐπίβοσον<δη>σάντων τινῶν τοῖς Κορινθίοις, καὶ μάχης γενομένης νικήσαντες, ψυγῆν τῶν Κορινθίων ἀποχωροῦμεν, ἐρέσῳν εἰς καὶ κτεῖνοντας ἀμα παίειν, <ἀλληλοίος> τὸν Δίὸς Κόρινθος ἑκέλουν. ὅθεν φησίν ὁ Δήμων, ἐτί καὶ νῦν ἐπὶ τῶν ἄγαν <μέν υπέρ> σεμουνιομένων, κακῶς <δε> καὶ δειλῶς ἀπαλλαττάντων, τὴν παροιμίαν ταύτην τετάχθαι.
autonomy; and when the Corinthians complained – “Korinthos son of Zeus”, they said, would “sigh” at this new state of affairs –, the Megarians took a stand and drove their oppressors away, adding insult to injury in the ensuing battle by encouraging one another to attack and kill ‘Korinthos son of Zeus’. The expression that concerns Demon here has nothing strictly to do with Megara; already by the time of Pindar (Nem. 7.155b) it apparently referred to idle repetition or tiresome drivel, as if the Corinthians were known for belaboring the dubious divinity of their eponym. Yet Demon chose to expound ‘Korinthos son of Zeus’ not simply through the obvious rubric of Corinth but by bringing Megara into the mix as well, by positing a period of Megarian subjugation and an uprising whose success was capped off by the commandeering of a Corinthian tag. In so doing, Demon highlights a common Megarian maneuver, or at any rate a maneuver commonly identified in Megarian tradition: the repackaging of outside and often hostile material (in this case the Corinthians’ taunt) for local use.

The circumstances that Demon adduced to explain the forced weeping of the Megarians, we see, differ markedly from those later forwarded by Zenobios. In Zenobios’s account, the tears are compelled at the behest not of Corinthians but of the Megarians’ own king, the otherwise unknown Klytios. The variation offers us another example of Megarian appropriation, yet in this case of a different order; for here it is not the Megarians as protagonists who co-opt outside material but the paremiographer himself, taking initiative away from Corinth and assigning it to Megara. Zenobios’s contemporary Diogenianos also emphasized Megarian agency in his discussion of the proverb, but he took the process a step further, generalizing the scenario and relocating the action entirely to Megara. Whenever any Megarian king died, he reasoned, his wife would oblige the populace to grieve for him. Later Byzantine paremiologists took a different tack, with Photios and the 6 For the historicity of Corinthian rule over Megara, possible but by no means certain, see Hanell 1934: 75-91; Salmon 1972: 197-198; Legon 1981: 60-70; and Parker, ‘Ephoros (70)’, commentary to F19, in BNJ.

7 6.34: Μεγαρεών δάκρυα: ἐπὶ τῶν πρὸς βίαν δακρύουσαν. Τοῦ βασιλέως αὐτῶν ἀποθανόντος ἡμαγκάσθησαν πάντες ύπὸ τῆς αὐτοῦ γυναικὸς δακρύουσαι. Ὅμοια τῷ. Πρὸς σήμα μητριμίας βρεθεῖν.
Suda removing the element of abasement altogether and linking the weeping solely to garlic, which the Megarid allegedly produced in spades.\textsuperscript{8}

Can we detect a gradual localization and adulteration of the explanations offered for ‘Megarians’ Tears’ from Demon onwards, with a putative phase of foreign domination supplanted by the authority of local kings and an act of degradation by a harmless response to local crops?\textsuperscript{9} There are, of course, difficulties with using ‘Megarians’ Tears’ and its etiology to map the contours of Megarian cultural memory.\textsuperscript{10} Nevertheless, it is not unreasonable to see the Megarians as themselves partly responsible for effacing or reinterpreting an early period of dependence to Corinth, whatever its historicity, and even for obscuring the ignominy of forced weeping altogether. Just as the Megarians in Demon’s story seize upon the Corinthian slogan ‘Korinthos son of Zeus’ and turn it on its head, so too might the historical Megarians in and after the late fifth century BCE have reinterpreted insults about crocodile tears and garlic and repurposed slanderous rumors associated with these insults, with the resulting traditions eventually finding their way into Megarian local historiography and thence to Zenobios. It is just this sort of pirating and sanitizing of hostile traditions, after all, that Plutarch imputes to the Megarians; by whitewashing the character of Skiron, he remarks in his Life of Theseus, Megarian

\textsuperscript{8} Phot. M172: ἐπεὶ πλείστα ἐν τῇ Μεγαρίδι σκόρδα φυέται, εἰς παρομίαν ἠλθεν ἐπὶ τῶν προσποιητῶς δακρύοντων. Suda M383 (Adler): Μεγαρέων δάκρυα: ἐπεὶ πλείστα ἐν τῇ Μεγαρίδι σκόρδα φυέται, εἰς παρομίαν ἠλθεν ἐπὶ τῶν προσποιητῶς καὶ πρός βίαι δακρύοντων, καὶ μὴ ἐπὶ σκείω πάθει, Μεγαρεῶς, ἡ πολιτει. See also Hesych. M484 and Mak. Chrysokeph. 5.88.

\textsuperscript{9} This is essentially the assessment of van Wees (2003: 62-63), who suggests in his essay on helotage that “These later versions [of the explanation of ‘Megarians’ Tears’] are easily understood as attempts to clean up the earlier story, from a Megarian point of view, by removing the stigma of once having been so humiliated by their neighbours”; but cf. Salmon 1972: 192 and Figueira 1985a: 264 (Diogenianos’s account, Figueira suggests, is not localizing but in fact ‘banalizing’ and “perhaps a result of careless abbreviation”).

\textsuperscript{10} For one thing, the garlic is not purely a Byzantine addition; Zenobios, as we have seen, already mentions it as a possible culprit, and Megara’s special claim to the vegetable had been proposed as long ago as Aristophanes (e.g. Acharn. 515-538 and 755-770). Not all late sources, moreover, prioritize the garlic to the exclusion of other explanations; in the fifteenth century, Michael Apostolius is still admitting that ‘Megarians’ Tears’ might have something to do with a dead Megarian king (11.10). Any hypothetical Megarian reaction to the story preserved by Demon about a period of Corinthian domination, finally, would surely have surfaced well before Zenobios, with changes in Megarian memory unlikely to have aligned themselves so neatly to the protracted development of the paremiology between Demon and Photios.
historians “attacked tradition” and “made war on the past” (Thes. 10): Skiron was not a highwayman, insist ‘the historians from Megara’, but a punisher of highwaymen (FGH 487 F1). It is perhaps no coincidence that the figure whom Plutarch, and indeed many subsequent discussions of Megarian tradition, tout as a symbol of Megarian revisionism is Skiron, that quintessential bandit, whose penchant was to rob those transiting the Megarid and hurl them into the sea.

Megarians would not be unusual either in generating an intentional history that reacted in some way to their neighbours or even in borrowing episodes wholesale from the cultural memory of other communities, like Corinth and Athens, and recasting them so as to emphasize local impetus and influence; it is never in a vacuum that a community constructs its past. Yet the Megarika and the local traditions on which they drew did take an idiosyncratic approach to this appropriation, I argue, relying less on outward aggression than on inward allure. Situated as it was, in the words of Stephanos of Byzantion, “on the isthmus between the Peloponnese on the one hand and Attica and Boiotia on the other,” the Megarid engendered a community whose collective memory was itself isthmian: not only restricted by and responsive to the traditions originating from either side but also adept in capitalizing on its intermedial position. By magnetizing the Megarid, by pulling Argives, Sikyonians, Boiotians, and Athenians inwards and burying them in Megarian land, the Megarian community advertised its territory as a conduit for Greeks and a thoroughfare of central importance. Before we explore this particular property of Megarian localism in more detail, however, it will be useful to provide some background to the Megarika and their authors.

11 = FGrH 487 F1: οἱ δὲ Μεγαρόθεν συγγραφεῖς ὡς τῆς φήμης βαδίζοντες καὶ τῷ πολλῷ χρόνῳ κατὰ Σιμωνίδην πολεμοῦντες οὐθ᾽ ὑβριστήν οὔτε ληστήν γεγονέναι τὸν Σκείρωνα φασιν ἄλλα ληστῶν μὲν κολαστίν, ἀγαθῶν δὲ καὶ δικαίων ὁικεῖον ἀνδρῶν καὶ φίλου.

12 οὐθ᾽ ὑβριστήν οὔτε ληστήν γεγονεῖ οὐκ Σκείρωνα φασιν ἄλλα ληστῶν μὲν κολαστίν. According to Pausanias, in fact, the Megarians believed that Skiron, the son of Pylas and son-in-law of Pandion, had challenged Nisos for kingship and ended up as Megara’s polemarch (1.39.6 [= FGrH 487 F3] and 1.44.6).

14 For the concept of ‘intentional history’, see Gehrke 2001; see also Gehrke 2003 and 2010.

15 Steph. Byz. s.v. Megara.
The Megarika

Modern students of the Megarika tend to take Plutarch’s lead in emphasizing the general reactivity of Megarian memory to foreign traditions and its affinity for plagiarism – without legends of their own, wrote Martin Vogt, Megarians resorted to “borrowing and stealing” from their neighbours\(^{16}\) –, as well as the significant role that Athens played in this dynamic. For Donald Prakken, the Megarika represented an ongoing “literary and historical polemic ... against Athens”;\(^ {17}\) for Felix Jacoby, Megara was always struggling under the weight of Athens, continually on the defensive and relying, in the absence of real political power, on an overblown and fanciful chauvinism;\(^ {18}\) and for Thomas J. Figueira, it was the ongoing conflict with Athens over the so-called Hierarchs that provided in the mid-fourth century BCE a “context for this intense Megarian effort to defend the honor of their community” through the writing of Megarika.\(^ {19}\) Even Luigi Piccirilli’s landmark edition of the Megarika, which sought in part to wrest Megara’s historiography from Athens’ grasp,\(^ {20}\) assigns the efflorescence of local historiography at Megara to a time of political decadence in the shadow of a culturally prestigious Athens.\(^ {21}\)

As these studies make clear, it is difficult to avoid exaggerating Athens’ contribution to the construction of Megarian identity since so many of our sources about Megara are Athenian or at any rate focalized by Athens. Save for what little we can cull from the Theognidea,\(^ {22}\) most of our earliest references to the Megarian past come down to us

---

16 “Bei der Dürftigkeit der megarischen Sage und Geschichte war man aber darauf angewiesen, teils durch Anlehnungen und selbst durch Räubereien aus fremden Sagenkreisen, teils durch blanke Erfindungen die Bedeutung des Heimatlandes künstlich herauszuputzen: die Spuren dieser Ruhmredigkeit, die für die spätere Kleinstadt charakteristisch ist, haben wir in manchen sagenhaften und auch scheinbar historischen Berichten gefunden” (Vogt 1902: 743).
17 Prakken 1944: 123.
18 “Aber dann muss man auch die lächerliche seite dieses lokalpatriotismus einer stadt betonen, die schon im verlaufe des 6. jhds ihre alte bedeutung zu verlieren beginnt und sich literarisch immer in der verteidigungsstellung befindet. Es genügt auf die reih e der gräber zu verweisen, die Megara für sich beansprucht” (Jacoby 1955: 229 n.6; but cf. 389 for the influence of other communities on Megarian local historiography).
20 Piccirilli 1975: v.
21 op. cit., vi.
22 We find, for example, an allusion in lines 773–782 to Alkathous’s wall effectively keeping the Persians at bay. Nothing survives from the other early Megarian poet, Philiadas, except an epitaph for the Thespians who died at Thermopylae.
embedded in Athenian cultural memory. Herodotus mentions Megara’s war with Athens over Salamis only in the context of Peisistratos’ coup (1.59.4), for example, and he dates the Dorian colonization of Megara in accordance to Athenian chronology, the kingship of Kodros (5.76). Thucydides, for his part, alludes to the tyrant Theaggenes, but only so far as he impinges on Kylon’s revolt (1.126.3-11). Even later writers like Strabo (9.1.4-8) and Pausanias (1.40-44) append their accounts of Megara to their respective books on Attica, while Plutarch, who does explicitly cite Megarian local historians, does so only in his Lives of the Athenians Solon and Theseus.

On occasion, our sources provide glimpses of connections to communities other than Athens. Hellanikos, for example, who notably wrote no separate work on Megara (as he had on Argos, Arkadia, Athens, Boiotia, Thessaly, and his own Lesbos), integrated elements of early Megarian history into his Deukalionia (FGrH 4 F18) and treated the eponymous Megareus, whom he envisaged as a Boiotian, in his chronology framed by the Hereas does quote an anonymous verse about the murder in Aphidna of Skiron’s son (FGrH 486 F2: τὸν ἐν εὐρυχόρῳ ποτ’ Ἄφιδνη / μαρμάρευον Ὁθησίς Ἴκτυν ἑνεκ’ ἱμικόμου / κτείνειν), but Plutarch, who preserves the lines (Thes. 32.6-7), tells us nothing about the provenance of the poet or the overall theme of the poem (see Hanell 1934: 11 n.2).

Herodotus refers elsewhere to Megarians, both individually and en masse. Yet his unflattering treatment of the Megarians at Plataia (9.14, 21, 28.6, 31.5, 69.2, 85.2; cf. 8.1.1, 8.45, 8.74.2, and 9.1 for earlier Megarian contributions to the Greek defense) was surely affected by the anti-Megarianism to which he was exposed during his sojourn at Athens. Thucydides’ sources for the foundation of Megara Hyblaia and Selinous in Sicily by the Megarians Lamis and Pamillos (6.4) are not entirely clear (see Hornblower 2008: 272-278), but they were certainly not Megarian. For Thucydides’ failure to engage with Megara’s role in the early phases of the Peloponnesian War, see Rood 1998: 68-69, 214-215.

According to both writers, the Megarid was originally part of Attica (Strab. 9.1.5; Paus. 1.39.4), and even though, as we shall see, Pausanias retains local Megarian traditions, he sometimes sifts these through an Athenian sieve (see, for example, 1.5.3 and 1.39.4 on the tomb of Pandion). We should note, too, that Pausanias even blames Megara’s eventual decline in the Roman period on the assassination of the Athenian herald Anthemokritos in the fifth century (1.36.3).!

Lyk. 1.8 = Dieuchidas FGrH 48 F5; Thes. 20 and 32.4 = Hereas FGrH 486 F1-2; Sol. 10 = FGrH 486 F4. It is at Thes. 10, moreover, that Plutarch refers to ‘historians from Megara’ (= FGrH 487 F1; see also Perikl. 30.3 = FGrH 487 F13). It is noteworthy that Plutarch, critical though he is of Herodotus’s local biases, does not bother to challenge the depiction of the Megarians in the Histories (de Mal. Her. 872c).

According to both writers, the Megarid was originally part of Attica (Strab. 9.1.5; Paus. 1.39.4), and even though, as we shall see, Pausanias retains local Megarian traditions, he sometimes sifts these through an Athenian sieve (see, for example, 1.5.3 and 1.39.4 on the tomb of Pandion). We should note, too, that Pausanias even blames Megara’s eventual decline in the Roman period on the assassination of the Athenian herald Anthemokritos in the fifth century (1.36.3)!

Lyk. 1.8 = Dieuchidas FGrH 48 F5; Thes. 20 and 32.4 = Hereas FGrH 486 F1-2; Sol. 10 = FGrH 486 F4. It is at Thes. 10, moreover, that Plutarch refers to ‘historians from Megara’ (= FGrH 487 F1; see also Perikl. 30.3 = FGrH 487 F13). It is noteworthy that Plutarch, critical though he is of Herodotus’s local biases, does not bother to challenge the depiction of the Megarians in the Histories (de Mal. Her. 872c).

According to both writers, the Megarid was originally part of Attica (Strab. 9.1.5; Paus. 1.39.4), and even though, as we shall see, Pausanias retains local Megarian traditions, he sometimes sifts these through an Athenian sieve (see, for example, 1.5.3 and 1.39.4 on the tomb of Pandion). We should note, too, that Pausanias even blames Megara’s eventual decline in the Roman period on the assassination of the Athenian herald Anthemokritos in the fifth century (1.36.3)! It is at Thes. 10, moreover, that Plutarch refers to ‘historians from Megara’ (= FGrH 487 F1; see also Perikl. 30.3 = FGrH 487 F13). It is noteworthy that Plutarch, critical though he is of Herodotus’s local biases, does not bother to challenge the depiction of the Megarians in the Histories (de Mal. Her. 872c).

According to both writers, the Megarid was originally part of Attica (Strab. 9.1.5; Paus. 1.39.4), and even though, as we shall see, Pausanias retains local Megarian traditions, he sometimes sifts these through an Athenian sieve (see, for example, 1.5.3 and 1.39.4 on the tomb of Pandion). We should note, too, that Pausanias even blames Megara’s eventual decline in the Roman period on the assassination of the Athenian herald Anthemokritos in the fifth century (1.36.3)!

Lyk. 1.8 = Dieuchidas FGrH 48 F5; Thes. 20 and 32.4 = Hereas FGrH 486 F1-2; Sol. 10 = FGrH 486 F4. It is at Thes. 10, moreover, that Plutarch refers to ‘historians from Megara’ (= FGrH 487 F1; see also Perikl. 30.3 = FGrH 487 F13). It is noteworthy that Plutarch, critical though he is of Herodotus’s local biases, does not bother to challenge the depiction of the Megarians in the Histories (de Mal. Her. 872c).
Priestesses of Hera at Argos (FGrH 4 F78). But by and large it is Athens that sets the tone of ancient discussions about Megara, and these tend either to echo the anti-Megarianism of mid-fifth-century Athenian discourse or at any rate to ideate Megara in direct opposition to Athens. Thanks in part to the careers of notable Athenians like Plato, Androtion, and Leokrates, Megara even earned the reputation as a haven for Athenian exiles; the Cynic Teles, who evidently spent some time at Megara after the Chremonidean War, depicts in his treatise On Exile a Megarian countryside swollen with the graves of Athenian rejects (29h). It is no surprise that Teles’ contemporary Chrysippus, when demonstrating the dangers of treating universals as particulars, chose Megara and Athens as the prime binary pair: “If someone is in Megara”, he quipped, “he is not in Athens.”

It is not until the second half of the fourth century that Megarians begin to write prose works exploring the Megarian community and its past, and for the first time preserving Megarian traditions in a Megarian framework. We know of five writers of Megarian local history (Megarika) before Strabo and Pausanias: Praxion (FGrH 484), whose history was

---

30 For the careers of notable Athenians like Plato, Androtion, and Leokrates, Megara even earned the reputation as a haven for Athenian exiles; the Cynic Teles, who evidently spent some time at Megara after the Chremonidean War, depicts in his treatise On Exile a Megarian countryside swollen with the graves of Athenian rejects (29h). It is no surprise that Teles’ contemporary Chrysippus, when demonstrating the dangers of treating universals as particulars, chose Megara and Athens as the prime binary pair: “If someone is in Megara”, he quipped, “he is not in Athens.”

31 It is not until the second half of the fourth century that Megarians begin to write prose works exploring the Megarian community and its past, and for the first time preserving Megarian traditions in a Megarian framework. We know of five writers of Megarian local history (Megarika) before Strabo and Pausanias: Praxion (FGrH 484), whose history was

---

30 See respectively Diog.Laert. 3.6, 2.106; Plut. de Ex. 14 605c–d (= FGrH 324 T14); and Lyk. 1.21.
31 τὶ δὲ καὶ διαφέρειν ἂν δοξᾶ ἐπὶ ἐξής ταφῆναι ἢ ἐν τῇ ἱδίᾳ: οὐκ ἀπόδος γὰρ τῶν Ἀττικῶν φυγάδων λοιποποιήσας τὸν σῶμα καὶ λέγοντος ἀλλ᾽ οὐδὲ ταφήνη ἐν τῇ ἱδίᾳ, ἀλλ᾽ ὅσπερ οἱ ἀσφεῖς Ἀθηναίων ἐν τῇ Μεγαρικῇ ὅσπερ μὲν οὖν ἐγέρεντες οἱ εὐσφέιτε Μεγαρέων ἐν τῇ Μεγαρικῇ, τι γὰρ τὸ δίαφορον; ἢ' οὐ πανταχόθεν, φησίν ὁ Χριστιππος, ἢτα καὶ ὁμοία ἡ εἰς ἄδος ὁδὸς; For Teles, see O'Neil 1977.
33 The title Megarika is explicitly given to the works of Praxion (FGrH 484 F1), Dieuchidas (FGrH F2a, 3–6), and Heragoras (FGrH F3 = BNJ 486A F1A and B). Plutarch, who is alone in citing Hereas, preserves no title for his work. A localized title like Megarika, of course, does not on its own prove that the cited text was a local history (see Marincola 1999: 295). But our citations do indeed suggest that the title is used by scholiasts (FGrH 485 F2b and 3, 486 F3), by Plutarch (FGrH 485 F5), by Harpokration (FGrH 484 F1 and 485 F2a), by Clement (FGrH 485 F4, cf. F1), and by Diogenes Laertius (FGrH 485 F6) to refer to works of local history, viz. narratives, dealing to some degree with the past, that were limited in scope by the real or imagined territory of a single community. We know, moreover, of other ‘Megarian’ texts that were not local histories, and these have their own system of nomenclature: Simylos’s Μегαρικῆ, which was probably a comedy (see Jacoby 1955: Noten 229–30 n. 7), and Theophrastus’s Μεγαρικῆ (Diog. Laert. 5.44: 6.22), likely a philosophical treatise. For the shadowy Πραγμάτευμα τῆς παραγωγής (Plut. Quaest. Conv. 5.3.7 675ε), who wrote somewhere of Ino and Melikertes, see below (n. 80). Thorough surveys of the Megarika have been undertaken by Vogt (1902: 737–743), Jacoby (1955: Text 389–400 and Noten 229–237), Piccirilli (1975), and now Liddell, whose commentary and translation of the Megarian local historians is an exemplary addition to BNJ (2007). See also the interesting treatment of Okin 1985: 11–14 and Figueira 1985b: 133–134.
at least two books long (F2); Dieuchidas (FGrH 485), whose Megarika extended to at least five books (F6); Hereas (FGrH 486); Heragoras (BNJ 486A);35 and Aristotle, whose Politeia of the Megarians certainly drew on and so must to some extent have resembled the Megarika.36 The fragments from these works are slender and few – we have under thirty37 –, and much of what remains, as we saw in the case of Plutarch, has been preserved in very Athenian contexts.38 Nevertheless, there is enough to provide a general impression of the Megarika, both in terms of authorship and content, and to suggest that in many ways the phenomenon of local historiography manifested itself similarly at Megara as at other Greek communities.

34 Donald Prakken argued (1941: 348 n. 2) that Praxion was a phantom and that the sole reference to his work on Megara (Harpokrat. s.v. Skiron = FGrH 484 F1) should be emended, the fragment reassigned to Dieuchidas (<Διευχίδης... ἤ Πραξίων<ος>). But Prakken’s argument (seconded later by Davison 1959: 221) was adroitly dismissed by Jacoby (1955: Noten 230 n.2) and Dover (1966: 205 n.4).

35 Jacoby, following von Williamowitz (1880: 8), treated Hereas and Heragoras together under FGrH 486, explaining the biformity of the name through hypocorism (1955: 394); Piccirilli wisely distinguished two separate historians (1974: 287-422 and 1975: 51-56, 75), as has Liddel, who provides Heragoras with his own BNJ number: 486A.

36 Aristotle’s work on Megara belongs to the corpus of 158 Politieiai that he himself wrote or whose composition he oversaw in the third quarter of the fourth century BCE (see in general Gigon 1987: 561-564 and Hose 2002: 15-105, 127-261). For the question of authorship, see Rhodes 1981: 50-51, 58-63 and Keaney 1992: 5-17. The existence of a Politieia of the Megarians (which Okin and Figueira interestingly attribute to Chamaileon of Herakleia [Okin 1985: 19; Figueira 1985b: 137-139]), is proven by Strabo (7.7.2 = Gigon 1987: 561), who says that in his Politieiai of the Akarnanians, Aitolians, Opuntians, Leukadians, and Megarians Aristotle treated the Leleges’ conquest of Boiotia. There are references to Megara also in the Politics (3.1280b14, 4.1300a17, 5.1302b31, 5.1304b35, 5.1305a24), a text that probably preceded but nevertheless engaged with a similar set of traditions as the Politieiai (see Rhodes 1981: 58-59). Like the Politieia of the Athenians, Aristotle’s work on Megara probably drew on local sources, perhaps the Megarika that Dieuchidas was writing at just about this time (for a good discussion of the sources of the Ath.Pol., see Rhodes 1981: 15-30; for Aristotle’s use of emic local historiography at Samos and Sparta in addition to Athens, see Tober forthcoming 2018).

37 Jacoby identified one fragment for Praxion (FGrH 484), eleven for Dieuchidas (FGrH 485), four for Hereas/Heragoras (FGrH 486), and thirteen anonymous fragments, which he collected under the heading of Sammelzitate. Piccirilli, on the other hand, followed Müller in assigning an additional fragment to Dieuchidas (viz. Parthen. Narr.Am. 13), separated Hereas from Heragoras, to whom he attached an additional reference (F1b = Eudok. Viol. 1021), and greatly expanded the corpus of anonymous fragments. Liddel, meanwhile, has chosen the middle ground, jettisoning Piccirilli’s category “Frammenti Adespoti di Provenienza Megarese”, and significantly reducing the fragments that Piccirilli included under the rubric “Frammenti Adespoti de Fonti Indicate Come oii Μεγαραῖοι” (he excludes Piccirilli F2b, 5, 6b, 9, 11, 12, 14, 17, 18, 19, and 21a–b).

38 Of the 16 discrete fragments from the Megarika of Praxion, Hereas/Heragoras, and Dieuchidas included by Jacoby in his collection, nearly half come from Athenocentric sources: three from Harpokration, one from a scholion to Aristophanes, and four from Plutarch’s Lives of Theseus and Solon.
For one thing, aside from Aristotle and Heragoras, about whom nothing is known, the writers of Megarika were themselves Megarian. Only Hereas, it is true, is explicitly called a Megarian, on two occasions by Plutarch (Thes. 20.1–2 and Sol. 10.5 = FGRH 486 F1 and 4). Yet Plutarch speaks elsewhere, as we have seen, of ‘the historians from Megara’ (Thes. 10 = FGRH 487 F1), so he was clearly aware of more than one native historian. Epigraphy provides further testimony. For a Megarian Dieuchidas appears with some frequency in the list of Delphic Naopoioi in the years leading up to the completion of the temple (338/7–330/29 BCE) – the name is rare enough to warrant the connection –, and he is there sometimes even identified as the ‘son of Praxion’. If we can indeed match up this pair of Megarians to our historians, Dieuchidas was evidently continuing or amending the history of his father, a phenomenon not in fact uncommon in the Greek world.

Like many other Greek local historians, moreover, these Megarians not only were members of the community about which they were writing but seem also to have enjoyed in that community positions of political or religious authority. Dieuchidas, once again, repeatedly represented his community at Delphi in the fraught decade following the Battle

---

39 For the tendency of Greek local historians to write about their own communities, see Tober 2017.
40 Ἡρέας ὁ Μεγαρέως.
41 The phrase that Plutarch uses, οἱ δὲ Μεγαρότεων συγγραφεῖς, is unusual in its prioritization of the historians’ provenance (but cf. Plutarch’s similar references to Naxian historians: FGRH 501 F1-3). When the local historians of Athens are cited collectively, it is the texts’ contents that are usually at issue (see Jacoby 1949: 1–2), and the same can be said for historians from Argos (FGRH 311 T1 and F2), Euboia (FGRH 427 F1–2), Aiolia (FGRH 301 F1), Chios (FGRH 395 F1), and Miletus (FGRH 496 F1).
42 CID 2.32, 75–76, 79A, 97, 99 (= FD III.5.20, 49–50, 48+63, 58, 60A); Dieuchidas is listed as Praxion’s son on two occasions (CID 2.76 and 97). For the Naopoioi as an institution, see Bourguet 1896; Roux 1979: 95–135; and Sánchez 2001: 124–152. For the equation between the historian and temple official – the name Dieuchidas, which is frequently muddled in the manuscripts (see Piccirilli 1975: 13), is in fact unattested elsewhere –, see Bourguet 1896: 233–234 n.1. Jacoby, who does not treat these inscriptions as Testimonia for Dieuchidas, nevertheless finds the correlation persuasive (1955: Noten, 231 n.5), as have others before him and since (see e.g. Schwartz 1903: 480–481, Prakken 1941: 349, and Piccirilli 1975: 14–15); but cf. Keil (1897: 413, n.1) and Davison (1959: 221), who argued that the historian lived a good deal after the Naopoios, from whom he borrowed the name in order to give his book “a certain cachet of antiquity”. Clement uses the ctetic adjective megarikos with reference to Dieuchidas (Strom. 6.26.8 = FGRH 485 T1), but this must mean first and foremost that he was treating Dieuchidas as an author of Megarika not that he considered him a Megarian.
43 See the comments of Liddel in the “Biographical Essay” appended to his commentary on Praxion’s Megarika. Modern examples of the phenomenon abound; we can think, for example, of the Florentine Nuova Cronica begun by Giovanni Villani and extended first by his brother and then by his nephew.
44 For an overview of the public life of Greek historians, see Meißner 1992: 215–315.
of Chaironeia, and, as Georges Roux has shown, the men chosen from the Amphictyonic poleis as Naopoioi were very frequently from families locally well-positioned. Hereas, for his part, may also have participated actively in the Megarian community. For at the beginning of the third century we find a Hereas, son of Aleios, as Theoros dedicating offerings to Apollo Prostasterios (IG 7.39), and this Hereas is perhaps himself the father of a Kallikrates who appears in a Megarian inscription dated to the middle of the third century (IG 7.141) and who is awarded proxeny at Delphi just after the Chremonidean War (FD III.1.189). Other inscriptions may perhaps also be brought into this discussion.

But the point in any case is that in Megara, as in a good many Greek communities, the decision to write local history was generally undertaken by locals who had a particular stake in claiming authority over their community’s collective past.

Megarian local historians, finally, adopted in their narratives a position toward their home community similar to that of other Greek local historians: even though they intended their work in part for local consumption, they nevertheless tended to imply a foreign audience, expounding details of Megarian behavior as if for the benefit of outsiders and generally engaging in what I have elsewhere called self-ethnography. Hereas detailed Megarian burial customs, for example, claiming, as Plutarch reports in his Life of Solon (10.1–6 = FGrH 486 F4), that at Megara the dead were buried facing west, with more than one body per tomb. This is normally, and quite reasonably, understood in the context in which...
Plutarch cites it, Salamis, with Hereas refuting a claim put in the mouth of Solon by an Athidogographer who had apparently exploited archaeological anthropology to prove Athenian tenure of the island.\textsuperscript{51} Yet whatever his aims, the Megarian Hereas clearly took pains in his history of Megara (geared, at least in part, for a local audience) to elucidate Megarian practice.\textsuperscript{52} Dieuchidas also included descriptions of epichoric custom, expounding the Megarian practice of placing a tongue on an altar after a sacrifice, for example, a gesture that he linked to an early exploit of Alkathous (\textit{FGrH} 485 F10),\textsuperscript{53} and elsewhere commenting on the so-called Aguieus, a type of column, evidently a common feature of the Megarian landscape, that he associated with the Darians (\textit{FGrH} 485 F2b).\textsuperscript{54} This is the sole fragment from any Megarika, incidentally, that has been preserved verbatim, and although there are some problems with the text, we see that Dieuchidas expressly adopts the position of an outsider, twice employing with reference to his own community the phrase ἔτι καὶ νῦν, a tag that often signals an ethnographic register.\textsuperscript{55}

Other evidence for the interest of Megarian local historians in Megarian custom comes from Plutarch’s collection of \textit{Greek Questions}, if indeed behind it lurk, as Karl Giesen persuasively argued, Aristotle’s \textit{Politeiai}, and if these texts did themselves draw on emic local historiography.\textsuperscript{56} Four of Plutarch’s \textit{Greek Questions} deal exclusively with Megara (# 16–18 and 59). One explains the peculiar Megarian use of the term ‘spear-friend’ by

\begin{itemize}
\item \textsuperscript{51} See Jacoby 1955: 395; Piccirilli 1975: 67–73; and Liddel ad loc. See also Prakken 1944, and Higbie 1997: 299–305.
\item \textsuperscript{52} Plutarch does not purport to be quoting Hereas’s text verbatim, it is true, but his use of the present infinitive suggests that Hereas was not writing about defunct Megarian practice.
\item \textsuperscript{53} = \textit{Schol. Apol. Rhod. Arg.} 1.516–518c: Διευχίδας ἐν τοῖς Μεγαρικοῖς ἱστορεῖ, ὅτι Ἀλκάθους ὁ Πέλοπος διὰ τοῦ Χρυσόσπου φῶνον γυμνασθείς ἐκ τῶν Ἱμάγων ἑρχετο κατοικήσων εἰς ἑτέραν πόλιν, ὡς δὲ περὶπετείᾳ λέοντι λυμαινομένῳ τὰ Μέγαρα, ἐφ’ ὅν καὶ ἔτεροι ἦραν ἀπεσταλμένοι ὑπὸ τοῦ βασιλέως τῶν Μεγάρων, καταγωγίζεται τούτου καὶ τὴν γλῶτταν αὐτοῦ εἰς πήραν θέμενος ἑρχετο πάλιν εἰς τὰ Μέγαρα· καὶ ἀπαγελλόντων τῶν ἀπεσταλμένων ἐπὶ τὴν θήραν ὧτι αὐτοῦ εἶναι οἱ κατηγοροῦμενοι, προσκομίσας τὴν πήραν ἤλεγχεν αὐτοὺς. διότερ θύσας τοῖς θεοῖς ὁ βασιλέας τὸ τελευταῖον τὴν γλῶσσαν ἐπέθηκεν τοῖς βοώισι· καὶ ἀπὸ τότε ἐθές τούτῳ διείμενε Μεγαρέων.
\item \textsuperscript{54} = \textit{Schol. Aristoph. Vesp.} 875(V): περὶ τοῦ Ἀγυιέως Ἀπόλλωνος Διευχίδας οὕτως γράφει ἐν δὲ τῷ ἰατρῷ τούτῳ διαμένει ἐτ᾽ καὶ νῦν ἐστὶ καὶ ὡς Ἄγυιεως τῶν Δωρίων οἰκεῖσχάτων εἰς τὸ τότε ἄναβημα· καὶ οὕτως καταμηνύει ὡς Ἁρμόδιων ἐστὶ τὰ τῶν Ἑλλήνων. τούτους γὰρ ἐπὶ τὰς κατηγορίας, ἀκομίσχομενοι τὰς ἀγυιάς ἰστάσαν ἐτ᾽ καὶ νῦν τῷ Ἀπόλλωνι. Ηραποκράτιος also refers to Dieuchidas’s discussion of the Agyieus, although he does not claim to be citing the historian verbatim (\textit{FGrH} 485 F2a).
\item \textsuperscript{55} See Tober 2017.
\item \textsuperscript{56} Giesen 1901: 461–465; see also Halliday 1928: 92–95.
\end{itemize}
postulating a period of stasis at Megara caused by tensions with Corinth; here, it is worth noting, the Corinthians who allegedly foment the Megarian civil war are described as “plotting to subjugate the Megarid,” not, as Demon would have it, already as successful conquerors let alone colonists of the region (Ait. 17 = Mor. 295 b-c). Two other Questions presuppose a period of ‘unbridled democracy’ following the tyranny of Theagenes; the first focuses on a law limiting interest on loans (παλιντοκία: Ait. 18 = Mor. 295 c-d), the second on the origins of a group of Megarians known as ‘Wagon-Rollers’ (Ait. 59 = Mor. 304 e-f). While certainly revealing a concern for local custom, these last logoi also suggest that some Megarika may actually have pursued Megarian history into the historical period.\footnote{Although cf. Figueira 1985b: 119–121.}

The remaining Question (Ait. 16 = Mor. 295 a-b) deals with an item of clothing worn by Megarian women: the so-called Aphanbroma. When Nisos was king, Plutarch writes, he married a Boiotian woman, Abrote, daughter of Onchestos and sister of Megareus, a woman of great repute and so beloved by the Megarians that when she died they mourned for her on their own accord. Nisos, wishing to maintain his wife’s memory among his people, ordered the townswomen to adopt the sort of dress Abrote had once worn, and he named the garment after her. Apollo evidently approved of this custom; for whenever the Megarian women wanted to change their clothing, his oracle forbade it.\footnote{The compulsory lamentation following the death of a Megarian potentate recalls the explanations of ‘Megarians’ Tears’ with which we began. The expression of mourning for Abrote, to be sure, is sartorial not lachrymal; but like Zenobios and Diogenianos, Plutarch (relying perhaps ultimately on local sources)\footnote{In his commentary on “Question 16”, Halliday suspects that “the tone of the last sentence” of the passage suggests that it did not come from a Megarian source, “and this is borne out by the details” (1928: 92), viz. that in Plutarch’s account Nisos’ wife was Boiotian and that it was her (Boiotian) brother, Megareus, who gave his name to the polis. Okin agrees, arguing that Plutarch’s source here cannot be (directly or indirectly) “Megarian historical tradition” since Plutarch “totally ignores Megara’s version of its own early history” (1985: 14). But Pausanias’s tortuous foundation narrative that} explains Megarian praxis through death and mourning and, more to the point, interprets this mourning as initially local, spontaneous, and genuine.

\footnote{Daniel Tober – Megarians’ Tears}

Localism in the Megarika

The writers of Megarika typify Greek local historians not only in the role they played in their home community and the pose they struck in relation to this community but also in their broad conception of Megara’s historiographical compass and command over the past. For like their counterparts in other communities, they incorporated within the confines of a locally restricted narrative a range of nonlocal material. Where the Megarika most markedly diverge from other local histories, however, is in the particular means by which they effected this incorporation.

Many local histories augmented the prestige of the focal locality by exploiting centrifugal force, by casting the local outward. The Atthides, for example, sent Theseus to Corinth, Crete, and the Black Sea; the Thessalika pushed Armenos beyond Pontos to found Armenia; and the Spartan Politeiai led Lykourgos to Iberia, Libya, and India. These enterprising locals, largely inhabiting the early period of a community’s past, were rarely made responsible for full-scale conquests of outside regions; their travels more frequently Halliday and Okin seem to have in mind (1.39.5) does not directly contradict Plutarch—what ‘the Megarians’ object to in Pausanias’s account is the ‘Cretan War’ and the alleged capture of the city in the reign of Nisos—, and even if Pausanias did in fact intend to say that the Megarians of his day rejected all links with Boiotia, there is no reason to deny that all Megarians, or indeed a particular Megarian historian, may five hundred years earlier have nursed other ideas about the ktisis. Hellanikos derived Megareus from Boiotia (FGrH 4 F78; see above n. 28), and it was Hellanikos who allegedly gave Dieuchidas his starting point (FGrH 485 T1/F1 = Clem. Strom. 6.26.8): διέκλεψεν καὶ Ανδροτίων καὶ Φιλόχορος Διευχίδας τε ὃ Μεγαρικάς, τὴν ἀρχὴν τοῦ λόγου ἐκ τῆς Ἑλλανίκου Δευκαλιωνείας μετέβαλεν (see Piccirilli 1975: 18). It is worth noting that Pausanias treats Deukalion in his section on Megara, saying that Megareus escaped the flood by following a crane to the heights of Mt. Geraneia and that Dieuchidas somewhere treated the mountain (FGrH 485 F8; cf. Etym. Mag. 228 [Gaisford], s.v. Geraneia). For Boiotian claims on Megara see Hornblower (1996: 240–241) on Thuc. 4.72.1.

60 See above (n. 33) for the implications of the title Megarika.

61 For Theseus’s travels, see e.g. Hellanikos FGrH F323a F14–17; Kleidemos FGrH 323 F17; Demon FGrH 327 F5; and Philochorus FGrH 328 F17, 110–111.

62 FGrH 129F1 and FGrH 130F1.

63 FGrH 591 F2.
served as indicators of one community’s influence over another or at any rate its involvement in the wider world. While we know that in at least one Megarika (that of Hereas) at least one Megarian (Skiron’s son Halykos) makes it to Aphidna in Attica to face Theseus in battle (FGrH 486 F2), Megarian historians generally annexed outside material by applying the opposite, centripetal, force and drawing the outside world in.64

In many local histories, this inward movement is best observed in the ideation of an original locality that exceeded, sometimes radically, the actual bounds of the civic community in the historians’ own day; the Atthides tended to include the Megarid in the kingdom of Pandion, the Argolika to posit an ur-Argos that comprised much of the northern Peloponnesos.65 Yet, while the Megarika do seem to have retrojected this sort of idealized territory, envisioning a primeval realm that included Salamis and probably Perachora as well,66 our evidence suggests that in Megarian memory centripetalism worked less to extend Megara’s size than to increase its mass. By exploiting Megara’s arterial status, Megarian historians found frequent occasion to intercept distinguished visitors as they traversed the isthmus and keep hold of them by burying them securely in Megarian soil.

Hereas’s discussion of Megarian burial practices and the paremiology of ‘Megarians’ Tears’ with which we began have provided us the opportunity already to note how the Megarian

64 There were other means, of course, by which Megarian historians addressed nonlocal material. One common strategy was simply to integrate (through digressions) into a narrative focalized by Megara episodes culled from the cultural memory of other communities: of Athens (BNJ 486a F1, FGrH 486 F1, and FGrH 485 F6), for example; of Sparta (FGrH 484 F4-5); and of Rhodes (FGrH 485 F7; Dieuchidas’s logos of the Rhodian kities is in fact thick with detail about the exploits of the children of Triopas and about the hospitality of an otherwise unknown Rhodian named Thamneus). In each case, Megarian historians imposed a Megarian framework onto other communities’ pasts, applying the same heuristic tools with which they worked and reworked their own community’s history and using Megara as a lens through which to focus the history of the wider Greek world.

65 For Athens, see FGrH 328 107; cf. Strab. 9.1.5; Paus. 39.4-6, and Plut. Thes. 25.3. For Argos, see FGrH 70 F115 and FGrH 334 F39; cf. Strab. 8.6.5.

66 For Salamis, see Hereas FGrH 486 F4 (with F1 and 485 F6). Regarding Perachora, Plutarch tantalizingly claims in his Greek Questions that ‘long ago’ some Megarians were known as Heraeis and Piraieis (#17 = Mor. 295b): τὸ παλαιὸν ἢ Μεγαρίς ὄκείτο κατὰ κώμας, εἰς πέντε μέρη γενομένων τῶν πολιτῶν, ἐκαλοῦντο δὲ Ἡραΐς καὶ Πιραιΐς καὶ Μεγαρεῖς καὶ Κυνοσουρεῖς καὶ Τριποδίσκοι. That his discussion here ultimately depends on Aristotle’s Politeia is corroborated by Aristotle’s reference to Megarian komai in the Poetics (1448a29–39). On the Perachora, see Salmon 1972; on the synoecism of Megara in general, see Robu 2014: 15-33.
community constructed its past with recourse to corpses and their interment. The best place to observe Megarian preoccupation with graves, however, is Pausanias’s Megarian itinerary. The whole Periegesis, it is true, brims with tombs. Yet Pausanias supposes for the Megarians a particularly rich relationship with the dead: at Megara, he proclaims, there are graves even within the walls of the polis (1.43.3)\(^67\). This relationship is neatly encapsulated by the anecdote Pausanias preserves about the otherwise unknown Aisymnos (1.43.3). After the fall of the monarchy, he explains, Aisymnos, whose reputation at Megara was second to none, asked Apollo how his community might thrive in the absence of its kings. Told to take counsel with the many, Aisymnos and his countrymen naturally understood this as a reference not to the dēmos but to the dead, and they accordingly built their bouleutērion in such a way as to incorporate the tombs of their heroes.\(^68\) Far from symbolizing stagnation and moribundity,\(^69\) the dead here contribute actively to the negotiation of civic identity at Megara. For Hereas, too, in fact, graves implied something both about the past (Megara’s onetime possession of Salamis) and about the present (Megarians behave fundamentally differently from their Athenian neighbours).

As in the case of Aisymnos’s bouleutērion, many of Megara’s graves were assigned to local heroes. Hereas wrote that Skiron’s son Halykos had his tomb at Megara, even though he had been killed at Attica (FGrH 486 F2). And Pausanias provides a litany of other dead Megarians, noting as he wandered through the isthmus the graves of Alkathous, his wife Pyrgo, and his daughter Iphinoë (1.43.4 = FGrH 487 F6),\(^70\) of Megareus (1.42.1 = FGrH

---

67 For Pausanias’s appraisal of Megara’s graves, see Muller 1981: 218–22.
68 ἐισὶ δὲ τάφοι Μεγαρείας ἐν τῇ πόλει καὶ τὸν μὲν τοῖς ἀποθανόντοις ἐποίησαν κατὰ τὴν ἐπιστρατείαν τοῦ Μήδου, τὸ δὲ Αἰσυμνόνος καλούμενον μνήμα ἢ καὶ τούτῳ ἡρώω. Ἡπείρους δὲ τοῦ Λαγαμέμνονος—οὗτος γὰρ Μεγαρέων ἐβασίλευεν ὡστότι—τούτῳ τοῦ ἄνδρος ἀποθανόντος ὑπὸ Σανδίνονος διὰ πλεονεξίαν καὶ ὑβρίς, βασιλεύει μὲν οὐκέτι ὑπὸ ἕνος ἔδοκεν φυσικόν, εἶναι δὲ ἄρχοντας αἰρετοὺς καὶ ἀνὰ μέρος ἀκουέιν ἀλλήλων. ἐνταῦθα Λίσυμωνος οὐδενὸς τὰ ἐς δόξαν Μεγαρέων δεύτερος παρὰ τὸν θεόν ἠλθέν ἐς Δελφοὺς, ἔλθων δὲ ἡρώτα πρότον τίνα εὐδαιμονίας καὶ οἱ καὶ ἄλλα ὁ θεὸς ἔρχεται καὶ Μεγαρέας εἰς πράξειν, ἤν μετὰ τῶν πλεῖοντων βουλεύσωσιν. τούτο τὸ ἐπος ἐς τοὺς τεθνεότας ἔχειν νομίζοντος βουλευτήριον ἐνταῦθα ὑκοδόμησαν, ἵνα φαίνηαι οἱ τάφοι τῶν ἡρώων ἐντὸς τοῦ βουλευτηρίου γένηται. For similarities between this oracle and that given to the Tarentines in Polybius (8.28.7), see Fontenrose 1978: 71. For the placement of the graves at Megara and its effects on the mythic space of the city, see Bohringer 1980: esp. 13–18 and, more generally, Pfister 1912: 445–465, esp. 459–462. For the office of aisymnetes at Megara, see Figueira 1985b: 140 and Herda 2016: 55–60.
70 cf. 1.39 (= FGrH 487 F3) for a different assessment of Iphinoë, see Dowden 1989: 78–80.
487 F5) and his son Timalkos (1.42.4 = Piccirilli 5.F8b = BNJ 487 F14b); of Tereus (1.41.8 = FGrH 487 F8); and of the Olympic victor Orsippos (1.44.1 = FGrH 487 F11). In each of these cases, it is true, Pausanias derives his information from ‘the Megarians’, not explicitly from the ‘writers of Megarika’. Yet, even if he did on occasion rely on information imparted to him orally by local guides – it is only at Megara, in fact, that Pausanias mentions being led around directly by an expounder of local matters (1.41.2; see 42.4) –, so much of what he attributes loosely to ‘the Megarians’ jibes with the fragments, retained elsewhere, of the Megarika.71 If this indeed implies a familiarity (direct or indirect) with the texts of Praxion, Dieuchidas, Hereas, and Heragoras, we would be justified in treating Pausanias’s account as a potential storehouse of quotations from and references to Megarian local historiography. Indeed, we might even be able to identify fragments of the Megarika in places where Pausanias has not explicitly adduced ‘the Megarians’ as a source, concluding, for example, that Megarian historians had themselves included the story of Aisymsnos and mentioned the graves of Kar (1.44.6), of additional sons of Alkathous (1.41.6 and 1.43.2) and of Megareus (1.43.2), and of the descendants of Melampous (1.43.5). If, however, Pausanias behaved aberrantly at Megara and relied there solely on oral sources, his testimony nevertheless suggests a remarkable perseverance and conservatism for Megarian tradition. This in and of itself should make his narrative, to whatever extent it adumbrates the contents of any specific Megarika, an accurate gauge for Megarian beliefs in the late Classical and Hellenistic periods and confirmation that the Megarians’ constitutive narrative was exceptionally attentive to the dead.

What stands out about Megara’s graves, in the Megarika and in Pausanias’s account, is how many of them were alleged to be occupied by non-Megarians, in particular non-71 On Pausanias’s use of local traditions and oral sources, see Lacroix 1994 and Pretzeler 2005: esp. 241-7. For the guides on whom Pausanias claims occasionally to rely, see Jones 2001. On Pausanias’s use of written sources, see Jacoby 1955: 60-62 (remarks directed specifically at Pausanias’s Argolika but in fact more widely applicable); Habicht 1998: esp. 64-94 on epigraphical sources; and Cameron 2004: 235-237. For Pausanias’s probable use of written sources in the case of Megara, including emic Megarika, see Piccirilli 1975: 81-82, who points out the significant overlap between what Pausanias attributes loosely to ‘the Megarians’ and the fragments from earlier Megarika, and Liddel, “Biographical Essay”, in “Anonymous, On Megara (De Megara) (487)” in BNJ. Pausanias’s complaint that “there has been an omission” among the Megarian exégētai about a particular sanctuary to Athena Aiantis on Megara’s acropolis (1.42.4: τὰ δὲ ἵς συνῷ Μεγαρέων μὲν παρεῖται τοῖς ἔξηγηταις) suggests, for what it is worth, that he is not thinking of a local guide’s momentary lapse of memory but of a written corpus to which he has access.

Megarians originating from either side of the isthmus. Dieuchidas reports in the third book of his Megarika, for example, that Adrastus was buried in Megara and that the tomb to which Sikyonians laid claim was only a cenotaph (FGrH 485 F3).\(^{72}\) The scholiast to Pindar who preserves this fragment (Nem. 9.30a) says nothing of the circumstances behind Adrastos’s burial in Megara; but there is no reason to suspect that Dieuchidas had made Adrastos a Megarian, and he likely explained the hero’s death as would Pausanias: that he succumbed to old age and grief over the death of his son while leading his army back to Argos from Thebes (1.43.1).\(^{73}\) It was a similar journey, according to Pausanias, that brought the Argive Koroibos to Megara. He was compelled by the Pythia to walk south from Delphi and settle wherever the tripod that he was struggling to carry happened to fall – he made it all the way to Mt. Geraneia, Pausanias says, before he dropped his heavy load; and although it was there that Koroibos spent the rest of his days, founding a village that he named Tripodiskoi after the incident, it was in the agora of Megara that he was buried (1.43.7–8).\(^{74}\) Alkmene came to Megara along the reverse trajectory, happening to expire, ‘the Megarians say,’ while walking from Argos to Thebes (1.41.1 = BNJ 487 F15).\(^{75}\) About her burial, Pausanias continues, the Herakleidai were immediately at loggerheads: some wanted to return the corpse to Argos, others to take it on to Thebes, where Amphitryon

---

\(^{72}\) = Schol. Pind Nem. 9.30 ἐπὶ τῆς Ἀδράστου εἰς Σικυώνα μεταστάσεως Ἡρόδοτος μὲν οὕτω φησίν ... ἀπαίς δὲ ὁ Πόλυβος τελευτῶν διδοὺς Ἀδράστου τὴν χώρην. Μέναρχιος δὲ ὁ Σικυώνιος οὕτω γράφει ... Ἀδράστος δὲ ... ἔλθεν εἰς Σικυώνα, καὶ τὴν Πολύβου τοῦ μετροπάτορος βασιλείαν παραλαβὼν ἐβασιλεύει τῆς Σικυώνος, καὶ τὸ τῆς Ἡρας τῆς Ἀλέας καλουμένης ἱερὸν καθ’ ὄνερο ὡκεί τόπον ἱερύσατο ... Διευχίδας δὲ ἐν τῷ τρίτῳ τῶν Μεγαρικῶν τὸ μὲν κενήριον τοῦ Ἀδράστου ἐν Σικυώνι φησιν, ἀποκείσαθα δὲ αὐτὸν ἐν Μεγάροις. See Hanell 1934: 97 and Jacoby 1955: 391 and Noten 232, n. 20. For Adrastos’s connection to Sikyon, see Hdt 5.67.

73 Piccirilli considers this reference a fragment from the Megarika although Pausanias does not attribute the anecdote expressly to ‘the Megarians’ (1975: 5.15). See Pind. Pyth. 8.48 for an early reference to Adrastos’s return to Argos.

74 = Piccirilli 1975: 5.19. While Pausanias does not explicitly assign this story to ‘the Megarians’, he does claim to have seen elegiac verses carved on the temple to Apollo that Koroibos allegedly built at Tripodiskoi, verses that told of the hero’s early exploits (the carved images above the verse, which showed Koroibos slaying Poine, were the oldest stone agalmata of which Pausanias knew). Pausanias assigns no provenance to Koroibos, but his assertion that the hero slew Poine “ἐν χάριν Ἀργείων” does not in itself imply that Pausanias considered him to be a Megarian (pace Rigsby 1987: 97).

75 Jacoby did not include this passage in his category Sammelzitate, but Liddel is surely correct that the subject ‘the Megarians’ ought to be carried over from 1.40.5.
and Alkmene’s grandchildren had been laid to rest.\textsuperscript{76} Apollo intervened, suggesting that they split the difference and bury Alkmene in Megara.

Other celebrated nonlocals in Pausanias’s account ended up at Megara for other reasons. Some had come on campaign, like Herakles’ son, Hyllos, who accompanied the Herakleidai on their invasion of the Peloponnesos and died at the hands of the Arkadian Echemos (1.41.2).\textsuperscript{77} Some had come to rule, such as the Athenian Pandion (1.39.4) or the Egyptian Lelex (1.44.3). Others had been on the run, fleeing oppression, like Eurystheus, who escaped from Athens after battling the Herakleidai, losing his life to Iolaus not in Marathon but at Megara (1.44.10). Some came already dead, like Adrastos’s son Aigialeus, who was struck down at Glisas in the first battle of the second Argive invasion, carried by his kinsmen to Pagai, and buried in what would henceforth be known as the Aigialeion (1.44.4). Others came to Megara expressly to die. So Iphigenia, whose father evidently brought her there before the expedition to Troy (1.43.1 = \textit{FGrH} 487 F10).\textsuperscript{78} So too Hippolyta, who ‘the Megarians say’ withdrew to Megara after the defeat of the Amazons in Attica and once there sank into a fatal depression (\textit{FGrH} 487 F10).

Extreme grief is itself a common theme. It motivates the death not only of Hippolyta and Adrastos, but also of Autonoë, who had left Thebes and come to Megara, according to Pausanias, in mourning for her son Aktaion – she eventually died from her pains in the village of Ereneia (1.44.5).\textsuperscript{79} And grief also attends Ino’s death. It was at Megara, Pausanias writes, from the so-called Molourian Rock, that the Theban princess, fleeing her mad husband Athamas, flung herself and her swaddled son into the sea (1.44.7–8). Plutarch preserves a similar story in his \textit{Table Talk} (675e = Piccirilli 5.4b = \textit{BNJ} 487 F7a), attributing to an otherwise unknown periegete named Praxiteles the variant in which Ino rushed down toward the sea along the so-called Path of the Beauty.\textsuperscript{80} The lifeless Melikertes \textsuperscript{76} See Plut. \textit{Lys.} 28 and \textit{De Socr. Gen.} 5 for the tradition that Alkmene’s grave was also shown at Haliartos.

\textsuperscript{77} = Piccirilli 1975: 6 F9; see also 1.44.10 = Piccirilli 5 F17.
\textsuperscript{78} See also Philodem. \textit{De Pietate} = \textit{P.Herc.} 248 F3.13–6. Aulis’s claim was apparently not secure, for Pausanias here also mentions an Arkadian version of Iphigenia’s fate, and the \textit{Atthides} seem to have placed her death in Attica (\textit{FGrH} 325 F14), perhaps, as Jacoby surmised, in answer to Megarian claims (Jacoby 1955: 186–188 and Jacoby 1931/1961: 345–455); see also d’Alessio 2012: 44–45 and Bremmer 2014: 176–177).
\textsuperscript{79} For Ereneia, see Muller 1982: 379–405.
\textsuperscript{80} See Piccirilli 1975: 100–101.
drifted or was carried by a dolphin to the coast of Corinth where he was honored as Palaimon. But Ino’s body could not escape Megara’s gravitational pull. Although she leaped far out to sea, Pausanias writes, the waves returned her to the Megarian coast, where she was found by the granddaughters of Lelex and buried not far from the prytaneion \((1.42.7 = \text{FG} \text{H} 487 \text{F}7)\).

This episode is the source of another lugubrious Megarian proverb: ‘The Sorrows of Ino’. Zenobios once again provides the fullest commentary (4.38):

Ino, the daughter of Kadmos, had two sons with Athamas: Learchos and Melikertes, and a daughter, Eurykleia. These were shot and killed by Athamas, when he went mad. And with Melikertes, Ino threw herself into the sea by the Molourian rock, and, when she was swept by the waves to Megara, the Megarians pulled her out, attended to her corpse generously, and called her Leukothea.... On account of these things, then, there is the expression ‘The Sorrows (ache) of Ino’. For achos is grief that renders mute (achaneis) those who suffer hardships.

Unlike ‘Megarians’ Tears’, a phrase that views the Megarians as outsiders, ‘Ino’s sorrows’ may well have had a local origin; its paremiology, at any rate, belongs comfortably to the Megarian community, touching on features of Megarian topography and cult as it does and presenting the Megarians not as vassals but as reverential hosts. Yet, like the proverb

---

81 See also Paus. 2.1.3.
82 κατὰ δὲ τὴν ἐξ τὸ πρυτανεῖον ὄδὸν Ἰνοῦ ἔστιν ἥρμον, περὶ δὲ αὐτὸ θριγκός λίθων: περφύκασι δὲ ἔπ’ αὐτῷ καὶ ἐλαίαι. μόνοι δὲ εἶναι Ἑλλήνων Μεγαρείς οἱ λέγοντες τὸν νεκρὸν τής Ἰνοῦ ἐς τὰ παραβαλλόσια ὀραν τὸ ἐκπεεῖν τῆς χώρας, Κληρὸς δὲ καὶ Ταυρόπολις εὑρέθηκε καὶ ταρακαὶ καὶ τῇ ὀγκοῦσας – ἰουγατέρας δὲ αὐτὰς εἶναι Κλῆσις τοῦ Λέλεγος –, καὶ Λευκοθέαν τε ὀνομασσθήναι παρὰ ὀραν πρώτοι φασίν αὐτήν καὶ δυσίκαν ἄγειν αὐτὰ πάν τούτοι.
83 Ἰνοῖς ἄχης: Ἰνῷ ἢ Κάδμου συνελθοῦσα Αδώάματι δύο ἐγένησε παιδᾶς, Λάρχον καὶ Μελικέρτην, καὶ ἰουγατέρα Εὐρύκλειαν. Οὔτοι ύπὸ Αδώάματος μανέντος κατετεύθησαν. Μετὰ δὲ Μελικέρτου ἢ Ἰνῷ ἐξηγήσει ἐσφυγμένης εἰς τὴν πρὸς τῷ Μολουρίῳ ἁλαττάν. Καὶ τὴν μὲν εἰς Μεγαρα προσβρασθέσαν Μεγαρείς ἀνελόμενοι καὶ πολυτέλως κηδεύσαντες ἔκλεασαν Λευκοθέαν τὸν δὲ Κόριθον Κορινθίων θάμαντες Μελικέρτην ἄγουσιν ἐπ’ αὐτῷ ἄγονα τὰ ἱσθιμα. Διὰ δὲ ταῦτα ἐφήστη Ἰνοῦ ἄχη, ἄχος γὰρ ἢ λῆπη, ἀχανεῖς ποιοῦσα τοὺς κακοὺς παθόντας. Ταῦτα δὲ δηλώσει καὶ Μενεκράτης ὁ Τύριος. Μενεκράτης ὁ Τύριος, cited here, is otherwise unknown (FHG II 344 F6). This etiology comes, in fact, from a tenth-century revision of Zenobios: the so-called Zenobios Parisinum (Ps.-Zenobios), a text that often interpolates mythological exegesis from the Library (for Ps.-Zenobios, see Kenens 2014: esp. 160–163). ‘Ino’s Sorrows’, which appears as early as Ibykos (F282b Campbell), is similarly treated in Arsen. 9.61; [Plut.] de Prov. Alex. 6; and Suda I 381.
with which we began, this one too shows the Megarians using lamentation as a means of appropriation, in this case of Ino and her anguish, behind which lie events much more at home in a history of Boiotia. Megara was not the only community that staked a claim on Ino – Pausanias mentions in his book on Messenia a place along the coastal road near Korone where Ino was said to have emerged from the sea as the divine Leukothea (4.34.4). But the Megarians managed to take permanent control of Ino through obsequies, latching on to her body before her apotheosis and binding it evermore to the Megarid.84

Graves of nonlocals do of course appear in other communities’ local histories and cultural memory.85 Pausanias himself records a good many such graves outside of Megara: in Athens, the tombs of Antiope (1.2.1), Deucalion (1.13.3), and Oedipus (1.28.8); in Corinth that of Medea’s children (2.3.6); the grave of Penelope allegedly lay at Mantineia (8.12.6); that of Anchises on the road to Orchomenos (8.12.8). But the burial of nonlocals is a phenomenon especially connected to Megara. Of the more than seventy graves that Pausanias notes in Attica, only fourteen belong to foreigners, and these include historical personages: the Plataians who died at Marathon (1.32.3), the Kleonaians who came to Athens’ assistance in 457 BCE (1.29.7), and Thessalians and Cretans who died fighting on behalf of the Athenians in 431 (1.29.6). Of the 27 graves that Pausanias places in the Megarid, on the other hand, a full half belong to nonlocals, and of the local occupants many come from the families of Alkathous and Megareus alone. Megara was well known for its tombs: in one striking epigram, Aratos even considered them as quintessential to Megara as columns were to Corinth (AP 12.129);86 and Sulpicius Rufus may not have had only Megarian decrepitude in mind when he wrote Cicero in 45 BCE that the city was an 85 Lykeas wrote in his Argolika about Ariadne’s burial at Argos (FGrH 312 F4); the tomb of Idmon crops up in histories of Pontic Herakleia (FGrH 430 F2 and 432 F15); and the Tegean Ariaithos, who wrote in his Arkadika about the Peloponnesian sojourn of several Trojans (FGrH 316 F1), seems to have located the graves of at least Aineias and Kapys in Arkadia (cf. Dionys. Hal. 1.54.1-2).

86 άργειος Φιλοκλής Άργηις καλός; οί Τε Κορίνθου/ στήλαι και Μεγαρέως ταυτό βοώς τάφοι/ γέγραπται καὶ μέχρι λοιπῶν Αμφιράσου/ ὡς καλός. ἀλλά ὄλιγον γράμμασι λειπόμεθα./ τώδ’ οὐ γάρ πέτραι ἐπιμάρτυρες, ἀλλὰ Ρηνὸς/ αὐτὸς ἴδων, ἔτερου δ’ ἐστὶ περισσότερος.
“oppidi cadaver” (Ad Fam. 4.5.4). The impression that we get from Pausanias, however, as from Dieuchidas and Teles the Cynic, is of a Megara pregnant with foreign bones.

When Megarians took it upon themselves in the late fourth and early third centuries to write about their community, they did so by recognizing that its past lay alongside, intersected with, reacted to, impinged upon other communities’ pasts. This ecumenical approach to local history was not unusual so far as Greek communities of the late Classical and Hellenistic periods were concerned. What does distinguish the localism articulated by the Megarika, by the traditions on which these texts drew and which continued to animate the Megarian community into the age of Pausanias, was the dislocation and removal to Megara of figures from the cultural memories of other communities. These dislocations did not, however, constitute plagiaries or “Räubereien”, as Martin Vogt once wrote, by which the Megarians sought “die Bedeutung des Heimatlandes künstlich herauszuputzen”. As our survey has suggested, rather than megarize these transplants by postulating local origins, Megarian memory generally maintained their foreignness, preferring to bury them as Thebans, as Argives, as Sikyonians. Megara’s self-avowed liminality was an influential trope, the foreignness of its graves axiomatic. This is evident in Pausanias’s account – so accustomed is he to assign Megarian graves to nonlocals that he readily interpreted even bona fide Megarians as foreigners – and elsewhere, too. According to Theokritos, in fact, Diokles, for whom the Megarians celebrated the Diokleia and whose tomb Megarian boys long venerated, was an Athenian exile (12.27-34).

87 post me erat Aegina, ante me Megara, dextra Piraeus, sinistra Corinthus, quae oppida quodam tempore florentissima fuerunt, nunc prostrata et diruta ante oculos iacent . . . tot oppidum cadavera.
89 He makes into a Samian, for example, the celebrated Megarian flautist Telephanes (1.44.6: cf. Dem. 21.17; Athen. 8. 351e; and Pa 7.159), who is called a Megarian not only by Ps.–Plutarch (De Mus. 1137f- 1138a) but also in a fourth-century choragic inscription from Salamis (IG II 2.3093). For Telephanes’ grave, see Herda 2016: 79-81.
90 The scholiast to Theokritos gives some background to the circumstances of Diokles’ death and the Diokleia held in his honor (12.27-33e), as do scholiasts to Pindar (Ol. 7.157; 13.156a and Pyth. 8.112 and 9.161). Aristophanes has his Megarian interlocutor swearing ‘By Diokles!’ in the Acharnians (774), which suggests an early recognition of local origins of the hero. Diokles was associated with Eleusis (see the Homer Hymn to Demeter 153, 474, 477 and SEG 53.48 A.fr.3.III.71), as Plutarch tells us (Thea. 10), which may explain the confusion in our sources about his origin.
Nor should these memorials be understood only as attempts to foster kinship with outside communities, let alone as vestiges of an authentic cultural heritage that Megara once shared with its neighbours. Such relationships may indeed have existed, and there were certainly occasions when the Megarians, or groups thereof, found it beneficial to retroject ties with Boiotia or with Dorian communities to the south, or when this sort of localism, which limned the Megarid as a facilitator of movement across the isthmus, would have seemed especially attractive: in the lead-up to the Peloponnesian War, to be sure, but also in the mid fourth century, when the Megarians were faced with new and shifting hegemonies to the south and north, as well as in the decades after Chaironeia, the age of Dieuchidas, when they found themselves negotiating yet another series of alliances.

But in whichever direction the Megarian community at any one time faced, by preserving the alterity of its corpses, by dragging eminent Greeks from both sides of the isthmus, over land or from the sea, and anchoring them to Megarian earth through burial, through the monumentalization of tombs and the mechanism of remembered tears, the Megarians were able to construct a past that foregrounded their territory’s vital faculty to bridge the Peloponnese and the rest of peninsular Greece, articulating a local identity that was parochial and cosmopolitan at once.

Bibliography

91 See Pfister 1909: 28–29 n. 80 for the contention that the Boiotian graves at Megara were indicative of Boiotian cult.
Berkeley.

